Objective

The goal is to uncover how Netflix scaled content, adjusted strategic priorities, and positioned itself for long-term viewer engagement.*

Key Insights

- Surge in Content Volume (2016–2019):

Netflix dramatically increased the number of titles added between 2016 and 2019, especially movies. TV shows gained traction more gradually but maintained a consistent presence.

- Genre Popularity Peaks:

Dramas, Stand-Up Comedy, and International Movies saw significant spikes in 2018–2019, reflecting Netflix's growing global footprint and emphasis on narrative-rich content.

- Content Depth by Genre:

Genres such as Musicals, Classic Movies, and Documentaries had the longest average runtimes, suggesting Netflix's willingness to invest in immersive, higher-production-value formats in specific genres.

- Audience Targeting via Ratings:

Genres like Horror and Stand-Up Comedy leaned heavily toward TV-MA ratings, while Animation and Children & Family content remained aligned with PG or TV-Y7 classifications — illustrating a clear segmentation strategy by maturity level.

- Strategic Dip in 2020:

A visible drop in content volume occurred in 2020, likely due to pandemic-related production delays. However, this also marks a pivot point where Netflix began refining its strategy — focusing less on quantity and more on content relevance and global resonance.

- Filters Used for Exploration

The dashboard and story allow interactive filtering by:

- Year Added
- Type (Movie / TV Show)
- Primary Genre

These filters enable users to dynamically explore how Netflix's strategy shifted across formats, genres, and time periods.

Recommendation:

Netflix should continue investing in high-duration, story-driven genres with global appeal — particularly Drama, International Films, and Documentaries. As content production normalizes post-2020, the company should shift focus from volume toward depth, cultural diversity, and audience precision. Strengthening long-form, niche, and mature-audience content will help Netflix maintain its competitive edge while deepening user engagement across international markets.
